A Town that Lives in One Building

Located in the beautiful state of Alaska, a little town called Whittier is tucked away in a picturesque area surrounded by mountains and the ocean. This hidden place is hard to reach: the only ways to and from Whittier are either by boat or through a one-lane tunnel that cuts through the mountains. This tunnel is unique because it is shared by both vehicles and trains.

The town has a grocery store, a museum, two hotels, and various job opportunities for all its citizens: police officers, municipal workers, educators at the local school, and marina staff. Tourism has grown over the last few years to become an alternative source of income, drawing visitors to attractions such as the Anton Anderson Memorial Tunnel, glacier jet ski tours, and boat excursions that offer breathtaking views of marine wildlife and icebergs.

But the most fascinating aspect of Whittier is perhaps the fact that nearly all of its 200-odd residents live under the same roof. The Begich Towers, a 14-story building, is more than just an apartment complex; it's a town! Whittier's winter months are known for their heavy snowfalls and intense winds. By having all the necessary facilities and services in one building, the residents don't have to brave the cold weather every time they need to do sports or go to church. Not even the children need to step outside to attend school, which is in a building connected through a tunnel. It's an amazing solution that makes life in such an extreme climate much more manageable.

Living in Begich Towers offers a sense of community and convenience that is hard to find elsewhere. The close proximity of homes and businesses fosters a strong bond among the residents. Whether they're sharing a cup of coffee at the café on the ground floor or attending a community meeting, the people of Whittier have created a unique and supportive environment. Whittier might be small, but it's a remarkable example of adaptability and community spirit.
